Not illustrated. 1916 Excerpt: .of Chicago On the basis of an experiment in nerve division, Head et al. have formulated a theory of cutaneous sensitivity which antagonizes the older conceptions based upon the work of von Frey, Goldscheider, et al. Owing to the wide and enthusiastic acceptance of the theory in many quarters, it is believed that a critical review¹ may be of service to students of psychology. Head s first observations concerned the recovery of cutaneous sensitivity in patients in whom cutaneous nerves had been injured or severed. To obtain more reliable results, Head sectioned a branch of a cutaneous nerve innervating a part of his hand and forearm, and thoroughly examined the sensitivity of this part before and after the operation and during recovery. On a certain region of the area affected he found a total insensitivity when the skin was lifted away from the deeper lying tissues, but this area did mediate certain modes of sensitivity when in the normal position. He concludes that this sensitivity belongs to the deeper tissues and not to the skin itself. This is termed deep sensitivity, and it comprises an appreciation of a contact stimulus giving skin deformation, pain due to extreme pressure, muscular activity, and the roughness and locality of contact stimuli. Granted the facts, the conclusion seems valid that this sensitivity is mediated by afferent fibers other than those innervating the skin. This aspect of Head s work contributes nothing essentially new, though the evidence is much more decisive...
